Mr. No-body Paper Doll

As the song goes, “You’re nobody until somebody loves you!”

Well, we at the Art Museums love our Mr. No-body! Dated 1682, this now rare tin-glazed earthenware figure of Mr. No-body would have been as easily recognizable in the 17th and 18th centuries as Disney characters are to us today. Our figure was inspired by the Mr. No-body depiction illustrated on the title page of the 17th-century woodblock printing of a play entitled “No-body and Some-body,” in which poor Mr. No-body is always taking the blame for everything. Although a fictional character, Mr. No-body was definitely a piece of 17th-century pop culture, with references to him making their way into Shakespeare's writings and those of many others, and portions of the play often reproduced in period newspapers.

No-body, and Some-body
Published by John Trundle
London, England, 1606
© Victoria and Albert Museum, London

Mr. No-Body
London, England, 1682
Tin-glazed earthenware
Museum Purchase, 1978-131
Color-in and cut out this Mr. No-body paper doll and his many outfits.

Inspired by objects throughout the Art Museums.
Create your own Mr. Nobody outfit.